In 2013, American company Jake's Wayback Burgers decided to open in Dubaï. This was its first location outside America (one location in Argentina). That restaurant owes its existence there to an partnership with Topaz MENA, a Saudi Arabian franchise development firm. Burger joints have found and still find a warm reception in the Middle East and North Africa, especially brands coming from the United States. The influx of American fast food chains has been largely attributed to a regional fascination with Western restaurants.
